Delaware Valley University Dining Hall Serves Campus Harvest

DOYLESTOWN, Pa. — Every week, Delaware Valley University students and staff deliver baskets of fresh food grown on the university's campus to the dining hall where they are incorporated into menu items for students to enjoy.

DelVal and Parkhurst Dining, the university's dining services provider, are working together to incorporate more local food from the university's farms into the menu.

"I think it's great that we serve food grown on campus," said Kerry Zwack, a senior horticulture major. "I get to see the food start from seed, go to harvest and bring it to the dining hall where I get to eat it."

The baskets of food harvested from the farms are delivered to Executive Chef Gerald Hunter, who develops the weekly menus based on what he receives. The chef is proud to be using DelVal-grown hydroponic lettuces, herbs, tomatoes and peppers year-round.

Hunter has also recently used food such as: basil, various greens, eggplants, cucumbers and the first year's crop of romaine lettuce. Some of the current menu items offered with farm-fresh produce include: greens for the expansive salad bar, vegan dishes and eggplant parmesan.

Parkhurst tries to be very flexible about what items they will take.

"In any given week, Parkhurst will take whatever the farm manager delivers mostly," said Parkhurst Dining's General Manager Joe Fryday, "To date, we have used Fryday. "To date, we have used 400 pounds of peaches from Del-Val's orchard and 400 pounds of corn from the fields."

Parkhurst works closely with farm manager Scott Smith and the School of Agriculture and Environmental Sciences to obtain food grown on DelVal's land. Hunter

Kerry Zwack, a senior at Delaware Valley University, delivers food grown on campus to Parkhurst Executive Chef Gerald Hunter.

will use the produce grown on campus as his first choice. Then, he supplements through local producers identified by FarmSource, Parkhurst's local purchasing program, which was pioneered in 2002 to support local agriculture and a farm-to-table dining experience.

Through FarmSource, Parkhurst

is able to identify and partner with some of the finest local growers, family-owned farms and producers of food in the local community. Today, Parkhurst works with more than 250 local farmers and producers, all within a 150-mile radius of its locations. The company is proud to source more than 20 percent of its food locally.